It is Wyandotte county's greatest love story.

It is Kansas City, Kansas' version of Romeo and Juliet, or Heloise and Abelard; though with Valentine's day near, it appropriately has a happy ending.

The Abelard in this instance is Abelard Guthrie, who in 1844 in the cabin of George Clark at 3rd and Armstrong married Quindaro Brown in the first recorded wedding in Kansas.

The story actually started in London about 1760, when a Jewish youth named Samuel Sanders was arrested and falsely charged with stealing coins. He was convicted and sold into slavery in the United States colonies.

Sanders escaped to North Carolina, met Daniel Boone and went with him to Kentucky, where he was captured by Shawnee Indians. He was adopted by the tribe and wed an Indian girl. Their daughter married an Indian captive named Adam Brown.

Adam Brown was captured by the Wyandot Indians as a child in Virginia. After marrying the Shawnee girl, he went on to become a chief of the Wyandot tribe.

Their granddaughter was Quindaro Brown. Historians disagree on the meaning of the first name. Some have written it means, "Daughter of the Sun," while a noted Kansas City, Kansas historian, the late Alan W. Farley, has written it is "a common Wyandot word meaning 'abundle of sticks' and interpreted by the adage, 'in union there is strength.'"

While Quindaro Brown was growing up with the Wyandots in Ohio, Dayton-born Abelard Guthrie was serving throughout Mexico with the U.S. Indian service in the Mexican war. He returned to Ohio, where in the early 1840's he was an official of the U.S. Land office at Upper Sandusky, Ohio. But for some unexplained reason, his appointment was not renewed. He was without a job.

It was about that time he met the young woman that historians term "one of the most beautiful girls in the Wyandot nation."

He fell in love with Quindaro Brown. He was a rejected clerk, in love with the daughter of a chief. But he was not rejected by the Indian princess. She was willing to marry him.

Her father, the younger Adam Brown, would not permit the marriage. According to an early history of Kansas, he "did not take kindly to Guthrie."

The chief thought he saw a way to stop the romance. The Wyandots by treaty of 1842 sold their Ohio reseraviton to the United States and sent Silas Armstrong and George Clark to scout a new land on the banks of the Missouri.

On July 22, 1843, the site was occupied by the Wyandot tribe (English settlers later added another "t" and the French added the final "e"). Shortly after they arrived, John McIntire Armstrong built the first dwelling at 5th and Freeman.

With them was Quindaro Brown, whose father, according to historical accounts, had "carried her away to Kansas" in an attempt to prevent her marriage to Guthrie.

But Guthrie followed. His, and Quindaro's, persistence finally convinced the chief they should be allowed to marry.

So in 1844 the "Daughter of the Sun" wed Tak-key-yoh-shrah-tach. It was the name given Guthrie by the Indians and meant "man with two brains."

The name was appropriate. Guthrie went on to become a leader in the town company, which was bordered on the north by the Missouri river, east by 18th, south by Brown Ave. and west by 42nd.

Guthrie was an ardent free-stater who ran an underground railroad during the Civil War. Primarily under his leadership, the area became a thriving free-state port, attracting people from Kansas City, Leavenworth and Atchison, "pro-slavery ports filled with border ruffians."

In October, 1852, Guthrie was elected as a delegate to the 32nd Congress. Thirty-seven votes were cast at the Council house near 4th and State. All were for Guthrie.

As a Congressional delegate, Guthrie was largely responsible for the organization of the Nebraska territory, of which Kansas was a part. (The name Kansas comes from the Kansas Indians and means "people of the west wind.") [people of the south wind is the usual interpretation].

But in Kansas City, Kansas, Guthrie is better remembered for a decision he influenced at an earlier council - a meeting which was to name the town site. Said Guthrie: "It shall be called Quindaro."

Quindaro N. (Nancy) Brown was the daughter of Adam Brown a Chief of the Wyandot Tribe. Abelard Guthrie had been appointed registrar of the U.S. Land Office in Upper Sandusky, Ohio, at the time of the Wyandot's removal to Kansas in 1843. Abelard met and fell in love with Quindaro Brown. He followed her to Kansas and married Quindaro over the objections of her father. Abelard was later adopted into the Wyandot Tribe as Tah-keh-yoh-shrah-tseh, 'the man with two brains,' because of his demonstrated intelligence. Quindaro Guthrie was able to convince her tribespeople to sell thier land to Charles Robinson of the Quindaro town company for the townsite. In appreciation, the town was named for her. Abelard became the first vice president of the new town company.

Notes for WILLIAM WALKER, JR.:

<http://skyways.lib.ks.us/genweb/archives/wyandott/history/1911/volume1/68.html#006902>

Governor William Walker erected a dwelling on the north bank of Jersey creek about one hundred feet north of Sixth street and Virginia avenue. Adjoining it was a log building that was erected by the Delawares when they owned the lands and it had been used as a pay house in which the Delawares received their annuities from the agent of the United States. The two were joined together and afterwards improved by the man who was to become the provisional governor of the Nebraska territory. Writing of this historic old building and the great man who occupied it, William Elsey Connelly says: " From the beginning it was the center of culture and of the 'Indian Country.' Every traveler and scientific explorer made it a point to visit 'West Jersey,' as Governor Walker called his homestead, and enjoy the bounteous hospitality of its owner and sage. Here he gathered his books about him and led the ideal life of a gentleman of ample means and refined tastes, for twenty years. Such happiness and peace came to him here that when death invaded this delightful home and left him alone, he welcomed death for himself, and died of a broken heart. Of these sad days he wrote: 'Now I stand like a blasted oak in a desert, its top shivered by a bolt hurled from the armory of Jove, and I will say

"Sweet vale of Wyandotte, how calm could I rest
In thy bosom of shade with the friends I love best;
When the storms which we feel in this cold world shall cease,
Our hearts like thy waters shall mingle in peace."

No greater man has ever lived in Kansas. He was the first man here who devoted himself to literary pursuits. No man can read the delightful journals left by him without being filled with aspirations for higher and nobler things - without being filled with a longing for the simple, beautiful life with books and singing birds and rolling woods.

Governor Walker, among strangers, would be taken for a full white man. He was educated, had been a postmaster in Ohio, and wrote interestingly for newspapers. He frequently delivered lectures of much interest. He was provisional governor of the territory and was a member of the territorial legislature after Kansas was organized. Not only did he speak the Indian language, but conversed in English and French. A perfect gentleman in bearing, he lived here until 1875, when he died at the home of a friend in Kansas City. He was buried in Oak Grove cemetery, that city, and no monument of any kind has been erected over his grave.

1831 - Visited the Platte Purchase as agent of the Wyandot Nation. At the Treaty of St. Mary's. Private Secretary of Gen. Lewis Cass.

1853 - appointed Provision Governor of Nebraska Territory, which included present day Kansas.

Named "Jersey Creek" - runs thru KCKs into MO River
Walker homestead named "West Jersey"
Lots 4,5,6,7, block 4, Sunnyside Addition, KCKs
House was old Delaware Payhouse
Built on to - became 2 stories - 10-12 lg. rooms

Many Wyandots spoke French better than English

Nebraska
Ne-brath-ks (shallow river)
Pawnee word

1857 - William Walker, Thomas H. Doyle, Cyrus Garrett and Henry McMullin were granted authority by the legislature of 1857 to run a ferry across the Missouri River, and to have a landing on land owned or claimed by the Wyandotte City Company, or others, within the town limits. Their ferry privileges were to run for 25 years.
